The Cattle Disease.

Mr. M. E. Richardson who was appointed by the Chicago Pork Packing Association to accompany Prof. Gamgee in his tour of inspection among the diseased cattle in Illinois, has made a report to that body, in which he makes a statement to the conclusion, first, that the malady is not an infectious disease, but a form of poisoning due to native cattle eating off lands polluted by droves of Texas cattle; that no system of medical treatment can be relied on or conveniently applied; that prevention consists in the separation and isolation of native from Texas cattle, which should be kept by themselves in proper inclosures; that the winter trade in Texas cattle can go on without the least danger to native stock; and that in all probability, even in summer, under judicious treatment, Texas steers can be cleaned of the poison which infects them. Prof. Gamgee concurred in these views, and said there could be no doubt that a simple fence would prevent the spread of the disease. It was his opinion that crowding, ill-treatment or neglect of cattle in their transportation had much to do with the spread of the malady. The same was not contagious. It did not spread far and wide, yet it had features like a plague. When proper treatment was shown cattle there was little danger of the disease spreading. The tick common among Texas cattle was blamed for propagating the disease to some extent. Such was a false idea. The poison in cattle inflicted with this plague was vegetable and not mineral, as was generally supposed, and was therefore difficult to be traced. Some Texas cattle shipped to Illinois and other Northern States had not communicated the disease.

It is reported that the farmers of Champaign county, Illinois, have lost $20,000 worth of stock, nearly all their cattle having died.
